

HARBINGER OPENS IN GREAT NEW SPACE!

One of the things I was most excited about upon my return to LA last week was seeing some of the new shops that had opened. One of the most anticipated was Joe Lucas and Parrish Chilcoat's shop Harbinger that has moved from Almont Yard to a bigger location on La Cienega. I missed the opening party by a night, but went in first thing the next day. Its just as well as I really got to take it all in without it being a mob scene. The paint was barely dry, but it did not disappoint!

Anyone that knows me is aware of what a bore I think the D&D building is. It houses great stuff of course, but its the concept of it all these beautiful things being in a corporate-like high rise on top of one another. Its just too much under one roof. I get a headache every time I go in there, that may be partially due to all the candy I eat strolling thru the showrooms, but still you get my point. One of the great things about LA is that a lot of showrooms are free standing shops reminiscent of what you see in Europe. Conveniently located within walking distance from my house is a stretch on La Cienega and Melrose that house some of the best interiors shops out here. Below are some of my favorite finds in Harbinger.

Probably my favorite piece in the shop was this plaster chandelier from a company in Paris. I already have 100 places I want to use it

How pretty is this Hilary Thomas bedding?

Analisse Taft's Fabrics, above and below were my favorites

Really crazy for the one

We just used this BeeLine Chair in a project. Bunny's full line is available here.

This Holland and Sherry Desk can be done in any of their fabrics. Its shown in a blue wool which I LOVE

Isn't this coffee table fun? The same woman also make the desk below
