Inspiration This study is definitely the most inviting room in the house. With so much lovely morning light, we wanted the room to have a cozy feel. It's where the kids do their homework and the homeowners go to escape chaos. It's all about putting texture and pattern together to give a room a welcoming feel.
How to use it These three paint colors together would be beautiful in a more formal dining room. Consider a coral, like Caramel Pink, for the walls, and for the trim—baseboard, crown molding, windows, and doors—use the color Dead Salmon to give it some depth. If there were pretty built-in cabinets, we would suggest Russet—either for the whole cabinet or just the interior.

Why it works We sought balance among highs and lows. The rug lends an ethnic quality that mellows out the wall color and the highly polished Deco coffee table. It keeps the room from feeling too relaxed. The tufted sofa is more masculine, but a rosy linen velvet softens it to the right degree.

Any pitfalls Reds are hard to get right—a heavy red can look cheap. Softer reds and corals are easy on the eyes and look great with dusty blues and grays!
Unexpected twist We like using large patterns on the walls in a small space—powder room, library, or entry hall. It produces a huge impact and makes the room feel bigger. It also becomes art for the room. (lucasstudioinc.com) ➤
